

before a German airplane had swooped down on a train carrying the 321st Infantry and killed three men, but the 324th was fortunately brought into Bruyères, noon, September 19, 1918, detrained and the Company hiked seven kilometres to La Neuville, arriving at 2:30 p. m. Next afternoon at 4 o'clock found the Company lined up for another long hike, and when it had arrived a short distance beyond Bruyères, twenty minutes was given to eat supper from the "Petite Sandwiches" that were carried in the messkits. To the left the big, hazy sun was lowering itself behind the verdant mountain and on the right was heard and seen the first battle between a Boche plane and the Allied anti-aircraft guns. Immediately orders were given to load rifles for the first time and they remained loaded from now on till the armistice. After climbing a very steep spiral road to the top of a mountain the Company arrived at L'Horme at 10 p. m., marching eighteen kilometres. The next day the ration cart failed to find "K" Company and the day's meals consisted of
